Silver halide emulsions can be damaged by adsorption from the environment of water or hydrophilic compounds, as well as by the effects of other chemicals in the emulsion. Such effects are generally considered undesirable because they can cause reduced photographic sensitivity, fog, or other effects. Silver halide emulsions can be doped with selected photographic dopants such as sensitizing dyes, development accelerators, anti-foggants and stabilizers. In the manufacture of photographic materials it is desirable that the doping be effected during the growth of the silver halide grains. However, depending on the dopant, doping can be inhibited by the presence of unreacted dopant in the grain. It is known that the remaining dopant can be removed by washing the emulsion with a developer (see, for example, U.S. Pat. Nos. 3,415,615, 3,574,137, 4,397,933, 4,778,742 and 4,945,035). However, not all dopants are removed efficiently by conventional washing methods. Photographic emulsions are also known to exhibit physical effects known as aging. Some of these effects are undesirable, particularly in graphic arts applications such as "x-ray" films, and are typically suppressed by "hard" (high pH)
