Choosing a type of memory card When you're setting up your camera, you need to know which type of memory card to use for the memory slot on your camera. Memory cards are the storage medium for your images. You can use any type of memory card as long as the model of your camera and the slots on your camera support it. If you are buying a new camera, you can use a standard MicroSD card or you can use the more expensive CompactFlash card. Many cameras are now supporting a mixture of both. If you are using both cards in a single camera, you will notice that your camera's card slot has two slits in it, one for each card. When I shoot my own photos, I use both types of memory cards. It's nice to have the versatility to use both types of cards, and the quality is better on the CompactFlash memory cards. ## Deciding whether to buy in-camera or to edit later When a photo is taken with a digital camera, it's captured as a digital file. The _layers_ you use to make an image mean nothing when the file is stored

As over the years, I've noticed that people who heavily favor specific printers have a similar tendency to game. Now the list does not cover all printer manufacturers, but it should be comprehensive enough for most people. Theoretically there is a possibility that some manufacturer might have already researched and recommended that game which is yet to come out, so even if some of their lists are not quite accurate the reference is still better than nothing. Ah, but then that's not what I'm saying. People that heavily favor certain manufacturers will also generally favor certain games. It's just that I, and others, know that people will find the whole package ridiculous, and that doesn't mean that none of the games are worth playing. That's all. One of the reasons I put this list together was because of a limitation I realized about the pages on Massivision and Ars Technica, a combination of the webmaster's job and an administrative schedule that was all out of whack. This is why there are two lists, one main, one secondary. And the secondary can't go to a large number because the server is stupidly limited in terms of space. The point is that, when someone wants to look up a game on a particular printer, they end up looking at the
