There are probably a couple of questions about this on here, but I haven't really seen a concise enough explanation to where I understand everything that's going on. If I generate a random number in my code, like with any function, the random number is, to the best of my understanding, only in the context of the code, because there are only going to be one or maybe a few instances of that function. I'm not sure how exactly that random number is stored in the processor. Is it in a register? I'd assume yes, but do multiple processors have multiple copies of that number? It's just an integer, so I assume there's just a table of every number it's been generated too. Does that number have a specific size? Like 32 or 64 bits? If it is in a register, does a register have a finite amount of bits for the number in it? If all of this is perfectly fine, but you're just doing integers, how do you implement a system that can produce numbers
