Since I only have older G3 (which is my latest computer) and older Windows XP (which is in another room) I haven't had any success, the light on the sound card is blue when playing, so I know that audio is there. All I can come up with is to not have the connector on the back of the computer properly attached, but I have checked that the cable was attached properly as well. A: This was a frustrating couple of hours on my part, but thanks to the information provided by Sober Shai and a bunch of other guys on the Apple Support Forum I managed to fix this issue (and more!). I'm posting this answer in case anyone else runs into a similar issue and ends up here. It seems to be a hardware failure rather than a software failure because: 1) It was only happening on my Macbook Pro, not my Macbook Air. 2) The results of the system diagnostics test was that there was 'no audio source'. 3) The light on the back of my computer was blue. 4) My friend also had his Macbook Pro fixed at the same time as me and he also had the same problem. So my problem had more to do with the presence of an issue on the audio hardware rather than a software issue. To begin with I returned the Macbook to Apple (I had purchased the laptop in November 2014, but the issue was reported in May 2015) and used their diagnostic test to help me find the reason for the no audio source. They sent me this system diagnostic test and told me to run it. It takes about 10 minutes and gives you a list of your hardware, software and network info along with some suggestions to try. Apart from the technical problem of why this was happening (and it was a real shame because everything sounded good in OSX), it was clear that I needed to make sure my audio hardware was working. The test I ran was 'System Audio tests'. This test is just a quick test to make sure your speakers and headphones are working fine. It showed that all of my input devices were working fine, including audio, microphone, webcam and games. Everything was perfect. The problem was that 'System Audio tests' only tested the speakers and headphones. Then I looked up the following: The speakers are at the bottom of my computer and the connectors are on the back of my computer. I did a quick google
